History In the mid-1970s, Autodesk, Inc. was run by three founders who had met while working at MIT, where they developed the first non-proprietary CAD software, VisiNICS. VisiNICS was packaged in small pieces and sold for an annual fee. The founders were dissatisfied with this model and decided to commercialize the software, starting with the purchase of a plotter (plotter drawing board). The founders envisioned a new design application that could work on the "desktop", at a time when PC-based software was in its infancy. (It was the first commercially available "personal" computer.) VisiNICS ran on a mainframe-based Unix operating system. The founders got a grant to develop the first version of VisiNICS. When they released it in 1977, it was in a format incompatible with the mainframe computers they were using. Their next attempt was a vector-based graphics program called ARTS, which was a packaged version of VisiNICS and the ARTS translator. A second version was released in 1978. ARTS was not yet ready for the mainframe computers that were the target customers. In 1978, John Walker joined Autodesk, along with the founders. Their new idea was to release the first non-proprietary design application for personal computers. ARTS was packaged for the Apple II. ARTS became AutoCAD in 1980. By 1980, the founders had left Autodesk to start a competing business. John Walker left Autodesk in 1981 to start the rival software company SimiDesign. In September 1980, Autodesk sold ARTS to SCO Software for $11.5 million in stock. In 1981, Autodesk released ARTS for the Macintosh, and in 1983 for the IBM PC. In 1984, Autodesk bought VisiCorp (VisiCalc) from Maxisoft for $9 million. Maxisoft's customer base was mainly in the aerospace industry. VisiCalc was based on VisiNICS, and it could be used as an engineering program, a finance program, and a database management system. VisiCalc was the first consumer-oriented 3-D vector graphics application. Autodesk released VisiCalc in 1984, adding 2-D drafting to its product line. A few years later, VisiCorp was sold to a company from Canada. In 1986, Autodesk changed its
