Patients with COPD may experience progressive disease when treated with monotherapy. Combination therapy including tiotropium may reduce the lung hyperinflation caused by long-acting beta2 agonists, reduce the risk of respiratory tract infections caused by long-acting anticholinergic agents, and protect against the risk of exacerbations. A 12-week, randomized, double-blind, placebo-controlled study was conducted to compare the efficacy and safety of olodaterol/tiotropium, olodaterol alone, or tiotropium alone in Japanese patients with moderate to severe COPD. A subgroup analysis of the data was performed by ACT substest score at trough (ie, the value at week 12/baseline). The olodaterol/tiotropium group was associated with a higher proportion of patients showing moderate and large improvement in the ACT substest scores (ie, ≥ 4 points) at 12 weeks of treatment than patients in the olodaterol or tiotropium groups ($P=0.012$ and 0.0006 , respectively). The olodaterol/tiotropium group had significantly fewer severe or moderate and severe exacerbations than those in the tiotropium group ($P=0.017$ and 0.0004 , respectively). The olodaterol/tiotropium group had a significantly lower incidence of adverse events than that in the tiotropium group ($P=0.0048$). The olodaterol/tiotropium combination was superior to either olodaterol alone or tiotropium alone with respect to the main clinical endpoints in Japanese patients with COPD. Olodaterol/tiotropium may be an effective treatment option for Japanese patients with COPD.
