Although not the fastest of the British steam locomotives, it is the most popular of the four British classes of 0-6-0 steam locomotives. With the steam locos, it was a matter of scale again. The BR were proud of their line of 0-6-0 locomotives. They were the backbone of the railway, the enablers of the modern railways of today. Steam was king! Because the non-passenger locomotive class were delivered to the various depots in convoy, they were usually fully loaded before departure. The BR were not alone in that, and they were used to a large degree of the heavy freight loads required along much of the British railway network. They would have taken very long journeys, often to far-flung destinations such as Scotland, Eire and Canada. They would have been in service for many years too. Developed in the 1950's, the class were designed around the operating constraints of steam railways, from the tipping point of the firebox and its heat to the efficiency of the boilers. The Class saw a great deal of service, both in passenger and freight work, and they remain ever popular with modellers to this day. The rail wagons also made very useful express cargo units. The wagon designs have inspired many of the standard broad gauge wagons of today. The locomotives are a match for passenger duties, although this would be a battle of endurance. For the heavy haulage tasks, the Class performed faultlessly and they were amongst the first steam engines to be equipped with the modern smoke deflector equipment. Their sheer size and the comparative lack of weight in the classes meant they were well suited for hauling freight trains at high speed. What does appear to have been a measure of practicality in the design is a hint of ingenuity; a water inlet on the underside of the firebox tank which proved to be handy when it was needed to quick cool the boiler. The Class is one of those locomotives that is greatly loved and equally loved to hate. It has that certain look, that seems to be inevitable. It is almost like the steam locos are saying: "Here we are! Get used to us! We are something special!" Welcome to the railway of Big Boys. Testimonials: Your game is a great representation of what's it like to work in steam loco department with the sheer size of these engines. The amount of detail c9d1549cdd
