Trending Posts By 1996, Mark Zuckerberg was out of college and had started building an online community â€” called Thefacebook â€” that would later become the revolutionary platform for what we now call social media. The goal was to help students be comfortable in their own skin. “We wanted to create a safe haven where people could be themselves without feeling judged.”. From an early age, children have an innate curiosity about the world around them, and want to understand how things work. Coding is a great way to get kids interested and involved in a variety of subjects. It's a small business which means you can create your own hours and jobs. And, if your child is getting bullied, coding might be an additional space of safety and security. As a result, children who are not comfortable trying something new don't come across the challenges of learning new skills in formal settings. In a world that values competition and productivity over creativity, coding classes are transforming schools. They're empowering students to solve real-world problems through technology. And they give young people skills that are in high demand. “As a teacher, when you open up a coding class, you get an array of different skills that students don't necessarily have,” says Amy Zirbel, a teacher at Fort Dupont School for Girls in Washington, D.C. “What's most exciting for me is how deeply students are learning. They're learning math, science and computer science at the same time.” The benefits of coding go beyond traditional education. Coding can also help kids in areas like STEM (science, technology, engineering and mathematics) and become part of the 21st century economy. It's something that can change the world, and young people need it more than ever. In this video, kids speak about their experiences in a coding class. En la última década, el debate sobre el rol de la tecnología en la educación ha evolucionado. In the last decade, the debate around the role of technology in education has evolved. Kids want to know how technology can help them to succeed. It can give them the skills to solve real-world problems, and boost their creativity.
