An excerpt from the interview will also be shown. The Trump administration told reporters at a briefing Tuesday that it doesn't know where the funds for the translation came from, but the White House Press Office told The Hill that it was the Saudi government. "This book was first published in hardcover a few years ago and the paperback was published in April," White House Press Secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said. "The book had been translated into multiple languages, including Russian. With this being such an important topic of discussion in our relationships, and the president's message to the American people, we thought it made sense to have this book translated into additional languages as well." ADVERTISEMENT Trump has written that he has been working with the Saudi government on his book, which focuses on how to get along with allies, and he has repeatedly criticized other countries' alleged mistreatment of women. The White House's statement on Tuesday didn't specify which country was providing the money. The White House has said Trump isn't getting paid for the book, but the president has said he received money for his first book in 2008. Trump previously denied collecting royalties. He also said in a 2015 interview on NBC's "Meet the Press" that the oil-rich kingdom gave him "hundreds of millions of dollars" in investments. "I have a f---ing building in San Antonio. F---ing beautiful building," Trump said. "Saudi Arabia, they're a wealthy nation. They've always been a wealthy nation. They've been a great nation for a

. Specific Signatures Data on the Primary Key field can be used to verify that the data in a record is correct. For example, an organization may have a process where they "tag" each order with a specific signature number. If a signature number is recorded in multiple records, then it is likely that the associated data are incorrect. The primary key field can be used to search the data for the correct records. Secondary Key fields The object owner can use secondary key fields to ensure that the integrity of the data is maintained as data is updated. This is especially important when maintaining consistency of data between tables that are connected through relationships. For example, if customer records are linked to employee records through a customer employee relationship table, then the customer employee relationship table also has a secondary key field to maintain the integrity of the data. When this type of primary key is used with foreign keys, it creates a star schema. The above schema has two tables linked through the customer_employee_rel table with a foreign key CustomerID in Customer. The Employee table has a foreign key EmployeeID that refers to the primary key of the related Employee table. When a user updates the data in the Customer table, the primary key should also be updated in the related Employee table to maintain consistency. Likewise, if the Employee table is updated then the primary key of the related Customer table should also be updated. In the above diagram, records in the first two diagrams have the CustomerID field set as the primary key. In the third diagram the primary key field is EmployeeID. When a user updates the Customer records, the primary key field of the related Employee record should also be updated. Likewise, if the Employee table is updated then the primary key of the related Customer table should also be updated. The primary key field may also be used to filter queries. For example, a user may only want to query customer records that have a specific customer ID. It can be very inefficient to include a filter to specify that only customer records with a specific ID should be retrieved, so the primary key field may be used to limit the records retrieved from the database. Additional information Primary key fields should be indexed to speed up queries, and to improve data retrieval performance. Primary key fields may be added to any table in a database design in order to provide data integrity, but the primary key fields should be unique and contain no null values. By making it a primary key
